

Abstract

This project investigates the background of tobacco consumption and implements an intervention program toward tobacco cessation among adolescent refugees living in Berlin. The project follows a psycho-social and education approach by developing a combination of social pedagogical and resilience formation methods. The intervention program brought about positive outcomes such as changes in lifestyle and dietary habits, enabling the participants to seek support and act as a medium to resolve conflict in a multicultural group.